Please Note: The earlier version of this article incorrectly reported that AFGE had opposed the SES bill; AFGE did not take a position on the bill. The Fed Times made the correction at AFGE's request.

A bill purporting to reform the Senior Executive Service cleared a House Oversight Committee markup session on Jan. 12, and was quickly met with disdain from a federal executive association.

H.R. 4358, the Senior Executive Service Accountability Act, includes extensive reforms for both accountability and new procedures for the removal of senior executives.

The bill was roundly lambasted by the Senior Executive Association, who took issue with the legislation's efforts to expedite the removal SES members for misconduct.

“In an effort to tout their dedication to ‘accountability,’ majority leaders in the Congress continue to push forward with the singular focus of carving out paths to summarily terminate career senior executives,” SEA interim president Tim Dirks said in a statement.

“As members scramble to gain political advantage and attach their names to would-be solutions, they fail to address the real issues and in fact create more serious problems by sending a dangerous and discouraging message that those who enter or consider entering the SES will be met with a 'guilty until proven innocent' style of justice."
